Higher Education Updates

Good Day All! The winter season is upon us, and this past weekend we got our first dusting of snow. It was beautiful although it only lasted a few hours. While the snow is gone for the moment, by planning ahead, we can avoid many dangerous weather problems. As the seasons change, it is a good time to check our car emergency preparedness kits and make sure that we have all that we need to handle any emergencies or unforeseen delays that winter weather can bring. For more information on car safety go to Ready.gov, and learn more about what to put in that kit. There is also a winter weather safety social media toolkit that contains preparedness messages you can share on your social media channels; you can copy the messages directly or customize them to reach your audience.

We have been sharing the past couple weeks that EMI is now on social media! We have our own LinkedIn, Facebook and Twitter sites. We are working hard to build up our ‘virtual’ community, so I thought I would share a few tips. First, the links below this update are the quickest way to get to our sites, but if you are trying to get to them via the search bar you will have the best luck if you enter “FEMA Training” in the search box for LinkedIn, FEMAEMI for Facebook and FEMA EMI for Twitter. We will be working with our social media team to add content that highlights our Higher Education Program efforts. Please take a moment to like and follow us. We have a goal to reach 8,000 and I will keep you posted on how we are doing.

Remember that this Thursday, December 15th is our Community Call at 2PM EST. I hope to hear from you then. The call in call information is 800-320-4330, PIN: 376368. The calls provide an opportunity to learn about new and ongoing projects in your emergency management academic community, explore ways that the Higher Ed Program can support the higher education community, and provide a platform for questions and open discussion.

The Emergency Management Institute is now on Social Media!
